Indigenous artist Yhonnie Scarce's new installation, Hollowing Earth at TarraWarra Museum of Art in the Yarra Valley, examines issues related to the mining of Uranium on Aboriginal land.

Scarce was born in Woomera, South Australia, and belongs to the Kokatha and Nukunu peoples. She is one of the first contemporary Australian artists to explore the political and aesthetic power of glass, describing her work as 'politically motivated and emotionally driven' and the work often references the on-going effects of colonisation on Aboriginal people.

South Australia is home to over 25 underground and open cut mines, many of which are operating close to occupied areas. Some of the substances that are being excavated in these mines are Zinc, Copper, Gold, Iron Ore, Coal and Uranium.

Scarce says, 'Uranium glass has been used in this work to represent the sickness that this material inflicts on those who have been in contact with it. But also the illness that is left behind once the earth has been opened and its contents have been exposed. Each "bush banana" form identifies the desecration of country, gaping holes and scarred surfaces, all of which is the aftermath of the disrespectful behaviour that mining inflicts on the planet'.
